SYNOPSIS:

WILLIAM FAIRBANKS SUBJECT

"PEACEFUL PETERS"

Peaceful Peters, a prospector who has wandered all through the West in search of gold, in the course of his travels finds an old man - Uncle Billy - who has been wounded and left to die in the desert. He does what he can for the old prospector who tells him that he has found a mine which he wanted, to quote his own words, "Buddy's Gal". But the discovery brought only tragedy to him: His claim had been rushed and he, himself, had been shot. He dies in Peaceful's arms as he tells him of these things, but before he goes he tells Peaceful where his mine is to be found, - two miles from Fool's Gold, a wild little town set down in the midst of the desert. Peaceful goes to Fool's Gold and then and there the action begins. He becomes involved in a fracas with "Cactus" Collins and "Sad" Simpson, two satellites of Jim Blalock, who is the proprietor of the Happy Hour Dance Hall and Saloon, and who is an evil influence in the town. Allied with Blalock is Pete Hunter, the official assayer of the community. Simpson and Collins come off decidedly second-best in their encounter with Peaceful and a lust for revenge burns in the hearts of both of them. Through a ruse Peaceful discovers that Hunter is crooked and he finds, too, that a great deal of Blalock's work can not bear the light of exposure. To Fool's Gold comes May Langdon, who has been attracted by an ad which Blalock ran, advertising for a new dancing teacher. It is obvious that a dancing teacher would be very much out of place in The Happy Hour, but this the girl - young and innocent - did not know. Peaceful takes her under his protection, much to the discomfort of Blalock who has marked her down as his own property. Peaceful foils a plot to do away with himself, and shortly thereafter interferes in another little scheme which has been designed to frame him for the robbery of the bank. The true culprits are disclosed to be Blalock, Hunter and the two would-be bad men, Simpson and Collins, and it is also proved that this quartette was responsible for the seizure of the Rainbow's End Mine and the death of Uncle Billy. Peaceful rescues the girl from a complicated situation in the dance hall, and she in his arms, confesses her love for him. She is none other than Buddy's gal, of whom Uncle Billy had spoken with his dying breath - Buddy being Uncle Billy's twin brother and therefore all ends happily.
